Not illustrated. 1898 Excerpt: ...made him beloved and famous among commanders, and one whose name and fame are honored the world over. May 23, 1861, Colonel Jackson was superseded in command by General Joseph E. Johnston, formerly of the United States Army, who proceeded immediately to organize the several regiments of infantry into brigades. He put the Second, Fourth, Fifth and Twenty-seventh Virginia regiments into one brigade, which was for a time known as the " First Brigade of the Army of the Shenandoah," and assigned Colonel Jackson to the command of it. General Johnston, quickly perceiving that the place was untenable, from a military point of view, advised its evacuation, and early in June, 1861, Harper's Ferry was evacuated and the troops ordered to Winchester. The First Brigade now received its first lesson in that rapid marching which afterwards made it known as " Jackson's Foot Cavalry." They bivouacked the first night on the pike between Charlestown and Berryville, having marched about fifteen miles. Tired and foot-sore, they prepared their first hasty meal, cooked their first "two-days' rations," and lay down to rest, "ready to move at a moment's warning." These orders were new to them then and sounded strangely in their ears; but it was not long before they became familiar sounds, even when they had no rations to cook and nothing to get ready to move. Before reaching Winchester, it was reported that General Patterson had crossed the Potomac and had reached Martinsburg, on his way up the valley. Colonel Jackson was put on his first "flank movement," to Bunker Hill, to head off Patterson, and, forming a line of battle across the pike at that place, awaited his coming. He came not, however, and Colonel Jackson proceeded to Winch...
